

Flipped — Game Jam Proposal

Overview (story not final, might be tweaked)

Flipped is a comic, choice-driven escape game. A clumsy electricity worker accidentally switches off the power in North Korea — a country whose propaganda insists its lights never go out — and has until sunrise to flee across the border.

Detail	Plan
Genre	Comedy choice-and-consequence adventure
Platform	Web browser (itch.io), with Windows download
Engine	Godot 4
Play time	~15 minutes per ending; ~40 minutes to find everything
Controls	Mouse only

Team - Eleventcent

Name	Contact [IndieConnect ID / email]
Swayam Hadape	swayam / swayam0901@gmail.com
Anisha Soni	anixaa / sonyanisha@gmail.com
Somesh Kamad	entropy / kamadsomesh@gmail.com
Pardhiv Garapati	sripardhiv.garapati / sripardhiv.garapati@gmail.com

Gameplay and flow

The player guides Jun through short comic scenes. Each ends on 3–4 illustrated choices: one moves the story on, the rest are slapstick fails. Each act ends at a checkpoint, and a fail sends the player straight back to the start of that scene, so failing never feels punishing.

1. Torchlight choices: in dark scenes, choices stay hidden until found with the torch.
2. Searchlight timer: choose before the sweeping searchlight reaches Jun.
3. Blackout fuses: three stolen fuses cut the power, changing a scene's choices — but using them early makes the river crossing harder.
4. Twist choices: some "obvious mistakes" secretly work.

5. Fail collection: every fail becomes a front page of The People's Gazette, with a completion counter that encourages replays.

Story

Setting. North Korea is famously dark from space, yet its propaganda boasts that the lights never go out. Every night, a giant glowing portrait of the Supreme Leader lights up Pyongyang.

Hero. Jun, a noodle-limbed junior switch operator, has one job: never touch the Big Switch. On his first night shift he sneezes on it, and the whole country goes dark. He has until dawn to reach the border.

1. The Ministry: escape the pitch-black building by torchlight.
2. The night train: ride north among inspectors hunting the culprit, hiding in the freight wagon or bluffing into their carriage.
3. The border river: dodge searchlights, using fuses to cut the power.
4. The twist: his supervisor waits with a boat. The switch was rigged — her "accidental" blackouts have helped people escape for years. But someone must stay behind to hold the darkness.

Endings

- Escape: Jun rows across, and a single streetlight flickers on — the first light he has chosen for himself.
- Twist: Jun stays behind as the country's new "clumsiest worker", sneezing on schedule.
- Secret: Jun disguises himself as a lamp post so well that he's installed in the capital square forever.

How the game fits the themes

- Light: the escape only works in the dark. Searchlights, the torch and fuses make light both the threat and the tool, and the story begins with a light going off and ends with one coming on.
- Twist: the planned blackout changes the meaning of the journey and the final choice; cutting the power flips a scene's choices, and some "wrong" options turn out right.
- Comic: both senses — slapstick comedy aimed at absurd bureaucracy, presented as a comic book — panels, speech bubbles, sound-effect lettering and newspaper fail pages.

Art, animation and audio

A smooth rubber-hose cartoon style with noodle limbs and thick ink outlines in beige and ink, with propaganda red and gold accents. Characters are animated as rigged 2D puppets in Godot with live in-engine lighting. Audio is one pompous patriotic march in several moods, team-recorded effects, and a state radio announcer reading each fail headline.

Scope

Target: 7–8 decisions, about 20 fails and 3 endings. The Act 2 route split and secret ending are cut first if needed; the light mechanics and twist stay. Tools: Godot 4, Krita, Audacity, LMMS, Git.

Content note

Flipped is light-hearted satire of propaganda set in North Korea. It names no real people, has no gore, and never makes light of the real hardships North Koreans and defectors face. The jokes target the absurd system, never ordinary people.